

Fleeting Glimpse

Trice Megginson

Driving through the South, I began to notice how man-made elements in the land could get lost in the lush, green environment. This is just one of the many aspects that add character to the Southern landscape. Traveling along the state and county highways of Southeast Georgia, I began to see touches of man that can sometimes be unique and quirky, and often times go unnoticed, mixed within the landscape. I chose to stop along the roadside and photograph these touches of man that can go unobserved, or perhaps only seen out of the corner of one's eye. This body of work captures those elements of man's touch on the land that often are only viewed out of a car window in a fleeting glimpse.
